VECTREN
Foundation

2007 ANNUAL REPORT

MESSAGE FROM THE CHAIRMAN

We enthusiastically accept our responsibility to serve the communities where we live and work, both as individuals and corporate citizens. Both Vectren and The Vectren Foundation play an instrumental role in “walking the talk” – providing more than $2 million in grants to help support the operation of and the programs offered by the many valuable not-for-profit organizations that make our communities strong. And a large number of these grants were accompanied by volunteer time and leadership by Vectren employees living our corporate value: community.

Our communities are facing significant challenges these days. The resources of many nonprofit organizations are being stretched to the limit as they attempt to address community needs. The Vectren Foundation believes communities must have a strong social infrastructure to thrive, so we continue to focus our giving on health and human services, civic and community development and education as well as arts and culture to help the nonprofits stretch their resource dollars.

Beginning in late 2007 and continuing into the future, an increasing number of Foundation grants are helping communities focus more on our environment and educating customers on how to conserve energy as well as natural resources. We believe this new strategic focus will help to shift our collective behavior, so we all will be in a position to mitigate our growing energy use and increasing energy costs.

I am proud of the many Vectren employees who are contributing their time, talent and leadership to nonprofit organizations. These employees are helping to guide charitable organizations to become more focused with their strategies, more efficient with their delivery and even more sustainable to better serve their clients.

The following pages share with you how the energy of the human spirit can – and DOES – help us all to be productive, comfortable and secure.

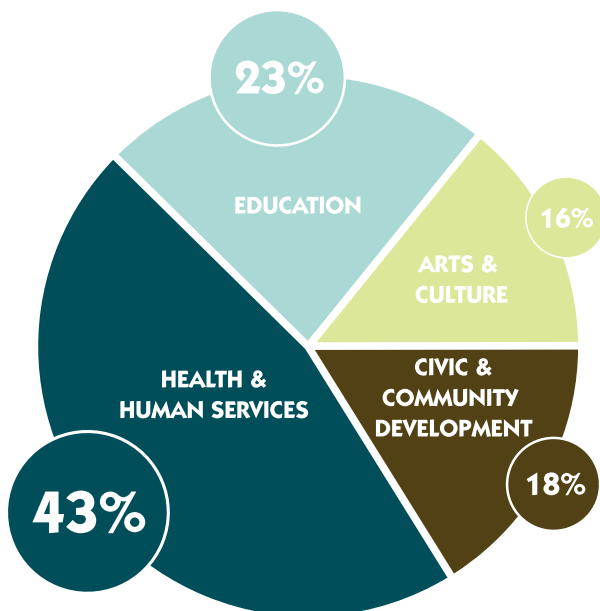

Sincerely,

Niel C. Ellerbrook
Vectren Chairman and CEO

Vectren Foundation is committed to educating the communities in which it serves through the following:

- Improvement in literary and critical thinking skills
- Classroom programs teaching creative skills
- Programs that prepare youth for higher education and entry into the workforce
- Higher education programs that support technological and business interests of the natural gas and electric industries

When the University of Evansville was looking for ways to act on its promise to become a leader in environmental issues, it turned to Vectren for help. Through a unique partnership forged in the summer of 2007, UE and Vectren created an 1,100-acre “outdoor classroom” that offers students an extraordinary opportunity.

The land, known as The Vectren Conservation Park-University of Evansville Environmental Research Lab, lies along the Wabash River in southwest Indiana. An ecologically diverse wetlands area, it has been under the protection of Vectren since 1999, when the energy company bought the property and enrolled it in the U.S. Natural Resource Conservation Service’s Wetlands Reserve Program. To transform the farmland back into an important wildlife habitat, Vectren planted 120,000 trees and 14,000 native shrubs.

It’s this richly reforested site that is now offering university students invaluable field experience in environmental research. As university scientists note, the thousand-plus acres of wetlands promise to offer remarkable insight into a recovering ecosystem. It’s that potential that Vectren CEO Niel Ellerbrook found attractive when the university approached him for help creating an outdoor research facility. To others, the property may have seemed just a vast tract of land; Ellerbrook saw it as a place where, as he says, “nature and knowledge combine.”

It’s a powerful combination given the potential. UE biologist Cris Hochwender predicts this expansive outdoor classroom will produce essential information about water purification, groundwater recharge, prevention of soil erosion, and the recovery of wildlife habitat. As exciting, the site may soon become a destination for archaeology students learning the art of excavation, creative writing students composing odes to the environment, and astronomy students in search of star-filled skies. Says Arlen Kaufman, director of the university’s environmental science program, “We’re at the tip of the iceberg.”

arts and culture

changing arts and culture, changing youth and adult lives

Vectren Foundation recognizes the need to foster creativity and celebrate unique forms of human expression. Arts and culture funding requests are awarded to groups that support or offer the following:

- Promote and support the performing arts
- Preservation and presentation of graphic arts
- Examination, preservation and presentation of the history of our communities and our culture
- Exploration of this amazing world and our interrelation with our environment

The power of imagination and the energy of the human spirit are what fueled an ambitious dream in the Indiana city of Terre Haute a decade ago. That is when a group of devoted citizens opened the Terre Haute Children's Museum in a 1,500 square-foot basement of an old church.

Within three years, they had found a new home in an old bank, doubling the size of their exhibition space. Since then, thousands of children have come to know the museum as a place to feed their intellectual curiosity and nurture their love of learning. Yet the community of believers who birthed the museum knew the possibilities for more were there.

So, too, did the Vectren Foundation, who in 2007 joined a battalion of supporters, from large corporations to small donors, in contributing to a major capital campaign that has raised millions of dollars to build a new children's museum. Slated to open in early 2009, the facility – devoted to celebrating the wonders of science, math, and technology – will be bigger than the original museum by more than ten-fold.

Museum supporters recall their decision to dream big and audacious. Booster Linda Edwards, who is serving as the museum's interim director, says the plan to raise $8 million was met with skepticism, given the museum's relative youth and inexperience raising money. It's a story she loves to tell, given how close the new children's museum is to opening its doors in Downtown Terre Haute.

Fittingly, the museum's new logo is a wide-eyed character that symbolizes "every child" and portrays the museum's pledge to make discovery a part of every magical experience inside its doors. That has been the mission ever since those early days when the museum was a modest grassroots initiative with the big ambition of developing a community of lifelong learners. Vectren is proud to be part of a project that serves and strengthens the Terre Haute community.

civic and community development changing communities, changing children's lives

Local Bedford children playing on the new Edgewood Park playground

Vectren Foundation supports events that celebrate the spirit of community, diversity and good citizenship. Foundation contributions are generally awarded to programs or agencies that meet the following criteria:

- Conservation of and education about natural resources or sound environmental practices
- Sustainability through preservation and revitalization of communities
- Programs that promote or celebrate the benefits of diversity in the community
- Programs that provide experienced executive talent to nonprofit organizations

Almost one out of every five dollars the Vectren Foundation spends goes to improving communities and making them sustainable. These civic projects celebrate the spirit of community, and nowhere was that spirit more evident than in the community of Bedford one hot August day last summer. That is when more than 175 volunteers turned out to take part in an ambitious project that transformed an unsafe play area in an aging neighborhood into a state-of-the-art playground that inspires community pride.

Vectren was one of a partnership of public servants, private individuals, local businesses, and generous corporate citizens who donated money to the Bedford Urban Enterprise Zone to buy playground equipment, but it was the good citizens of Bedford who deserve the praise for the success of Edgewood Park Build Day. Project organizer Natasha Johns remembers what the park's old play area looked like before the renovation. "It had an old wooden playground that had to be taken down because it was so unsafe," Johns recalls. "It was just a little spot of pea gravel."

The transformation of that "little spot" into a destination for neighborhood children and their families took place over the course of a long day of labor by volunteers who worked in teams. Their work ran the gamut – from serving up iced tea to thirsty workers to heavy manual labor. "The community just came together," says Johns. One great joy for many who donated their time that day came from knowing the playground would be a safe destination not just for Bedford citizens but for their neighbors. Edgewood Park is located next to a hospital, the Bedford Regional Medical Center, which provides essential medical care for residents from throughout the area. Could there be a better place for such an inviting park or one that instills such a sense of community pride? Johns says, "It's so cool to see what a community can do."

health and human services

changing homes, changing people's lives

Vectren Foundation contributes to nonprofit agencies that reach out to those in need and build a strong social infrastructure:

- United Way Campaigns
- Access to quality healthcare and nutrition
- Quality, affordable housing for low-income families
- Care and protection of children at risk
- Preparation and support for challenged workers to enter the workforce

In the midst of so much need, how can any one person make a difference? That's the compelling question that the founders of a volunteer-driven, nonprofit organization called Rebuilding Together Dayton asked themselves more than a decade ago. Their answer: All you really need is a willing heart. From that humble answer has come an impressive effort to provide and preserve safe and secure homes for hundreds of elderly and disabled low-income citizens in Dayton, Ohio.

Rebuilding Together Dayton is a classic example of how the energy of the human spirit can strengthen communities. How does it work? Rebuilding Together Dayton connects hundreds of volunteers ready to donate their time and skills to help their neighbors in need. Using materials and equipment donated or purchased through monetary donations from supporters – including Vectren – the volunteers perform the kind of home-repair and home-maintenance projects that can make the difference between home loss and home ownership for people with limited resources.

Among the scores of Dayton residents who have benefited from this kind of community partnership is Leoma Watts, a woman who still lives in the home that she and her late husband built in 1971. Leoma's son, Arnold, and his two children live with Leoma and help care for her, but the family could not afford on their own to make the kind of repairs needed to maintain the home. After contacting Rebuilding Together Dayton, a team of volunteers showed up at Leoma's home to repair a leaking roof and to replace damaged downspouts. The effort had a major impact, protecting both the home's foundation and the interior from significant damage. Rebuilding Together Dayton was also able to install a new energy-efficient water heater that will significantly reduce the family's monthly energy bill. Rebuilding Together Dayton embraces the slogan, "One House at a Time" convinced that when it comes to building strong communities even the smallest of efforts can make a mighty difference.

Day of Caring in Greenfield, Indiana

On a late summer day in 2007, hundreds of Vectren employees throughout the company's service area stepped away from their offices and worksites to spend a day engaged in a different kind of work: Fanning out across their communities, they donated their time and talent to scores of labor-intensive projects designed to improve the quality of life in their cities and towns. In taking part in the annual United Way Day of Caring, they helped kick off the United Way's annual campaign to raise millions of dollars for programs that serve those in need. Among those who took part in the day was Andy Higgins, manager of Vectren's eBiz team, who summed up the sentiment of his colleagues well when he said, "Corporate leadership is about more than dollars." Vectren has long been a leader in supporting the United Way and the non-profit agencies it helps fund. Vectren's core value of community is echoed in United Way's mission to improve lives by mobilizing the caring power of communities.

At Vectren, that means time, talent, and treasure from employees throughout the service territories. Inspired by the good work done by the United Way, Vectren employees raised the bar for the United Way campaign in 2007, increasing both their level of participation and the amount of giving by 15 percent. Through individual donations, employees raised $408,000 in 2007 for United Way agencies in Indiana and Ohio. That's up from their generous contributions of $346,000 in 2006. Of the many who gave, 141 of them reached an important United Way leadership giving level, each pledging contributions of $1,000 or more. But that's not all: Added to the employee donations were generous corporate matches and gifts and money raised from special events. Vectren's total gift topped $742,000. Vectren was proud to be acknowledged as a leader in United Way giving. Like the United Way, Vectren employees know it takes the whole community working together to create lasting change.

Vectren employees were the driving force behind a multitude of grassroots initiatives in their communities in 2007 – both in contributions and volunteer hours. They donated more than 20,000 hours of labor in 2007 to help nonprofit organizations across Vectren's service territories – a 15 percent increase over the number of hours contributed in 2006. From digging dirt in landscaping projects to stocking the shelves of food pantries, Vectren employees volunteered their time and talent to projects designed to strengthen the social fabric of their communities. Many of the Vectren employees were able to leverage their efforts into real dollars for these community projects, qualifying for community service matching grants and community partnership project grants from the Vectren Foundation.

Their efforts are impressive and inspiring to their colleagues. Says Jeff Whiteside, Vectren's vice president of external affairs and sustainability: "I continue to be amazed by the exuberant volunteer spirit of our employees. Whether it is reaching out to support a community need or walking for a cure, our Vectren colleagues are making a difference and impacting their communities in meaningful ways."

That volunteer spirit extends through all four categories that the Vectren Foundation supports: arts and culture, health and human services, civic projects and education. Their efforts are wide-ranging, and the organizations they help cover a wide array of needs – too numerous to mention here. But whether they are mentoring at-risk youth, coaching Special Olympic athletes, raising much-needed dollars for local public broadcasting, or engaging in any of the multitude of good causes in their communities, they share a common goal: harnessing human energy to change the world in which they live for the better. "Our employees believe in Vectren's corporate value – community – and bring it to life through the community service they provide throughout our service territories," says Whiteside. "They truly illustrate what being a good corporate citizen is all about."
